The main line of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad passed through the southern end of the borough, providing access from New York City via the terminal at Hoboken, New Jersey. Delaware Water Gap, from Winona Cliff, Pennsylvania by William H. Jackson, about 1900. The Gap is about a quarter mile wide at river level and nearly a mile wide from the top of one mountain to the top of the other. With the railroads now also promoting the Gap as a destination, 16 more hotels sprung up in the village of Delaware Water Gap by the century’s end. Additional rail lines, such as the New York, Susquehanna, and Western served the New Jersey side of the Gap. By 1900, the resorts of the Water Gap in Pennsylvania reached their peak, while western New Jersey’s landscape was made up mostly of farms and villages with a handful of hotels, like the Karamac and several farmhouses-turned-guesthouses. In 1909, a guide to summer resorts in the area said The reader's journey begins at the Delaware Water Gap, often noted as "The Gateway to the Poconos." There were eight stops along the Lackawanna route and where one chose to stop would only be conjecture. Perhaps it was an advertisement, word of mouth or even the appeal of a postcard received from a friend. The remaining stops were East Stroudsberg, Analomink (Spragueville), Henryville (Oakland), Mount Pocono, Pocono Summit and Tobyhanna (Nagle's Stack, Tobyhanna Mills). In the last of the 1800s people began to flock to the area in droves and the tourist industry began to flourish. See and discover other items: history of pennsylvania railroad, historic hotels.
