It seems, however, that my morbid fashion associations may have been somewhat prescient: dealing with death in fashion is, well, totally in fashion. First is the artist Melanie Pullen, a photographer who shoots carefully orchestrated crime scenes featuring girls in designer clothes. She has a new exhibit opening this week in Milan (running through the shows next week) and after seeing her work, I must say if they ordered me to the gallows I'd be less likely to resist if I were dressed in a Lanvin coat and Chloe platforms. Is there any other way to go? The installation features mannequins getting serious with gas ovens, bottles of bleach, and the ever-fashionable noose, all while wearing footwear from Miu Miu, Marc Jacobs, and NDC. The book is an exploration of the portrayal of death and sex in Western society in the age of the internet, and it features works of artists such as Damien Hirst, Roy Andersson and Lars von Trier. With images sometimes nuanced, sometimes confrontational, the Death Book is a truly a visually compelling experience. Here's our Q&A with the editors Matthew Holroyd and Edith Bergfors: What is the genesis of this book? MH - In western culture we tend to sell everything with sex and also with death, via the promotion of youthfulness. Edith, how did photography helped with your grieving process? Death in Fashion.
